Local anesthesia, although prior to 1884 it had been induced by freezing, as by salt and ice, ether, and ethyl chlorid, did not attain general popularity before that year, when Roller demonstrated the anesthetic properties of cocain. Since then the advance of surgical anesthesia, both general and local, toward perfection has reached a remarkable point of development, for the attainment of which humanity owes to dentistry no less a debt of gratitude than it does to medicine. In operative interventions in the oral cavity, which, while involving but a limited area, are so extremely painful, local anesthesia seemed from the beginning to be specially indicated; in fact, so welcome has been the elimination of pain in dentistry that the limits necessarily attaching to this beneficent aim have at times been overstepped, and progress has been jeopardized, and legitimate and conscientious effort discredited by the exploits in painless dentistry of unethical practitioners. The ethical dentist should, therefore, gladly avail himself of a guide which, issuing from the pen of a recognized authority, will aid him in adopting a safe and scientific method of inducing local anesthesia, in raising the standard...
