Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: . . . are wearing will be outmoded tomorrow, objects the conservative. Perhaps, but are not the reactionaries' clothes outmoded already. But a critic must have more than the modern spirit, if he is to fulfill his function. He must hold the balance not only between art and life, but between past and present. He must see the present as the child of the past. Balance must therefore be the aim. It will not be our achievement--perfect balance is attained only in death. We aspire to live. And life in its highest manifestation is the striving of atoms to find order in chaos. The balance attained is tentative, the pendulum swings around the centre, but it is dynamic. And there is no life without movement, no movement without passion. o o This is at least a beginning. Let us face the future. . G. C. E. would draw for the rival publications--those were the days of real art, real competition, real rivalry, fought out, mostly over schooners of beer and frankfurters in the real art centres of New York--and there were then no uplifters or dry boosters--the curses of art, for no dry country ever has produced art, does produce art, ever will produce art, only deceit, lying, imitation, hypocrisy. None of these men would tell a rival what he was doing--it was all a secret, a mystery, and to be on the inside was wonderful. Everyone was keen about the magazines and what the next number would contain--the...
