They advise physicians as to diagnostic methods which are furnished by the laboratories and often assist in the collection of specimens for laboratory examination, such as the withdrawal of spinal fluid, the taking of blood for the Widal test, and of nose and throat cultures, etc. If rare or unusually serious diseases notifiable by wire, including epidemic cerebrospinal meningitis, acute anterior poliomyelitis and epidemic encephalitis, are reported, or if a common disease prevails unduly and local measures for its control appear to be inadequate, an epidemiologist is usually sent. Ideally, the epidemiologist should be sent out upon receipt of the report of a first case of certain of the usual communicable diseases if not for all. For example, in diphtheria outbreaks, now and then the source of infection is traced directly to a very mild case of diphtheria in the acute stage or to a well...
