Jesuit Possevino, sent to Russia by Pope Gregory XIII; the influx to Moscow of Venetian, German, Scandinavian, and even French adventurers, --all these innovations accustomed the Russian government to look toward the Occident. 27. Conclusion. --The XVI century had witnessed striking transformations and discoveries. It had contributed to the birth of new nationalities, to the unity of France and of Spain, and had opened the doors of Europe to the last of the great nations, which consummated the task of creating the modern European world. At the moment when Philip II, Elizabeth, and Henry IV disappeared, modern monarchical Europe found itself well established. France, in the enjoyment of religious peace, now prepared to exert in Europe for a century an actual political and intellectual domination. Spain still shone with a clear brilliancy in the genius of her artists and writers, but ill-gotten wealth and religious fanaticism destroyed her moral stamina, and she entered upon a period of slow and majestic decline. Germany prepared herself for a bloody civil war between Protestants and Catholics. This ruined her for a century, and permitted France to paralyze her by an alliance with Sweden, Poland, and Turkey, which, for a time, interposed a barrier between central Europe and the Russian Orient. England, upon the contrary, found in the Protestant Reformation the moral force which permitted her to shatter the attempts at monarchical absolutism by the Stuarts, to found a representative government, and to lay the foundation of her...
